American video game player For others named Billy Mitchell, see Billy Mitchell (disambiguation). Billy MitchellMitchell in the 2014 Twin GalaxiesPersonal informationBornWilliam James Mitchell Jr. (1965-07-16) July 16, 1965 (aged 55)Holyoke, Massachusetts, United States NationalityAmericanCareer informationGamesPac-ManDonkey Kong William James Mitchell Jr. (born July 16, 1965) is an American video player and restauratear He rose to highlight the country in the 1980s when Life inserted it in the photo spread of champion games during the heights of the arcade game. In 1999, Mitchell became the first person to record a perfect score of 3,333,360 points on the Pac-Man arcade game. [1] The Twin Galaxies and Guinness World Records recognized Mitchell as a holder of several records on classic games including Pac-Man and Donkey Kong, and he has appeared in several documentaries about competitive and retrogaming games. The 2007 documentary, King Kong: A Fistful of Quarters, follows his attempts to maintain the highest score on Donkey Kong after being challenged by newcomer Steve Wiebe. [1] In 2018, Mitchell's high score was challenged after members of the Twin Galaxies forum found a contradiction in the video Mitchell had prepared for King Kong, suggesting he may have used emulation software to abolish his score. [2] Both the Twin Galaxy and Guinness cancelled all Mitchell records, but Mitchell managed to appeal to reverse guinness removal in June 2020. [2] [3] The Twin Galaxies did not reverse their disbelief, leading Mitchell to file a defamation lawsuit against the Twin Galaxies and others in 2020. In addition, the Mitchell family owns restaurants in Hollywood, Florida and Pembroke Pines, Florida, and he sells Rickey World-Renowned Hot Sauce. [5] Early Life Biography and Mitchell's first record was born in Holyoke, Massachusetts, and grew up in South Florida. He attended the Chaminade-Madonna College Preparatory School in 1983 and soon began his job as a manager in the kitchen of his parents' restaurant, Rickey Restaurant. [6] In grade school, Mitchell became an affonymous pinball player. [6] He was initially uninspired in video games, but when they became more popular, according to Mitchell, [e]veryone stood around the Donkey Kong machine and I wanted that attention. [1] He started playing video games around the age of 16. [1] His interest was also driven by friendship competition with classmates, both trying to outline each other in Pac-Man and Donkey Kong. [6] Mitchell became curious about whether Donkey Kong had a world record high score, and reached Walter Day at the Twin Galaxies, at the time a single arcade in Ottumwa, Iowa, who had begun tracking the record. Haris tells him a record 1.4 million by Steve Sanders. In November 1982, Life brought several notable arcade players, including Mitchell, to Ottumwa for pictures. Knowing it is impossible to reach the score Sanders has claimed, claimed, shows that the game had an inevitable kill screen when he reached level 22, while then set a score high of 874,300 standing for more than 18 years. [6] Currently, Mitchell is friendly with Robert Childs, who has a business of buying and installing arcade cabinets in places like laundry. [6] In 1983, Day invited Mitchell along with several other players from photoshoots to participate in the Electronic Circus, a 40-city tour in which the players would show their skills at the arcade game at every stop. But the idea fell and Mitchell and others spent the summer months camping out at the Twin Galaxies and competing for a high score on video games, with Mitchell focusing on only a few titles selected. [6] Later that summer, Day founded the U.S. National Video Game Team, a slim version of the Electronic Circus aimed at stopping in major cities in every US state, but the inaugural event has plenty of snags. [6] Days continued to bring Mitchell on multiple trips to confirm the high score reported by the players, with Mitchell regularly calling for bluffs. [6] By 1984, Day named Mitchell the Twin Galaxies player of the year, but due to a 1983 video game accident, the Twin Galaxies had to close its store front in March 1984, although it still traces scores. After submitting a record score for BurgerTime in 1985, Mitchell moved away from video games for the next ten years, spending more time in his family's restaurant and eventually taking possession of it. [6] The Pac-Man Pac-Man challenge was released in 1980. Players have found that it also has a type of kill screen: at reaching level 256, half the screen will be filled with nonsense glyphs that make it impossible to complete the level and proceed. Following a 1982 claim made by eight-year-old players hit more than 6 million points, that got national coverage after President Ronald Reagan wrote to congratulate the player,[1] Mitchell teamed up with his friend Chris Ayr in 1983 to determine that the highest possible score on the Pac-Man was 3,333,360, requiring a no-perfect run of deaths and accumulating all possible points at nonsense levels 256's , requires knowledge of where the dot can be eaten. [6] In 1999, a group of Canadian players, including Rick Fothergill, reportedly nearly reached the theoretical high score, leading Mitchell to return to video games to try to beat this group to achievements. On May 8, 1999, Fothergill set the world record, only 90 points lacking the perfect score. In response, on July 3, Mitchell reached the perfect score at the arcade in Laconia, New Hampshire, and game world record as noted by Funspot and Twin Galaxies. For this, Namco, the creator of Pac-Man, took Mitchell to Japan for the Tokyo Game Show that year to name him Video Game Player of the Century. [6] After returning in November 1999, Mitchell offered $100,000 to the first person to graduate Level. [7] The prize was not claimed by the deadline of January 1, 2000. Back in the Mitchell game (centre) with fans on December 19, 2007In 2004, Mitchell reached Donkey Kong's high score of 933,900 ahead of several witnesses at the Midwest Gaming Classic. [8] Writing about Mitchell for Oxford America in 2006, David Ramsey described Mitchell as perhaps the greatest arcade video game player of all time. [1] In 2005, newcomer Steve Wiebe tried to get past Mitchell's score, an event documented in the 2007 film The King of Kong: A Fistful of Quarters. Wiebe tried to have Mitchell present at these events to challenge him directly, usually in the Funspot arcade, as public demonstrations of high scores were prioritised over video tape. Mitchell has said, For me, the most important is to go to a dissented location, such as Funspot, which makes it official; if tomorrow Tiger Woods golfs 59, the big problem. If he did it in Augusta, that's where it counts. [9] Mitchell failed to appear at the Wiebe event, saying he hadn't played the game for half a year and needed re-training and practice for the competition. [10] During Wiebe's attempt, he reached scores of more than a million points on the arcade unit at his home, which was recorded on video tape and was initially received by the Twin Galaxies but was later withdrawn, as the Wiebe unit used an unofficial Double Donkey Board that had circuits for Donkey Kong and Donkey Kongr. Later in his attempt, Wiebe again managed a high score that beat Mitchell's 2004 record ahead of several witnesses at the New Hampshire Funspot, which the Twin Galaxies received. Just hours later, Mitchell handed his own tape to the so-called Twin Galaxies to show he reached a new high score of 1,047,200, the best of Wiebe scores and the Twin Galaxies received as a new official world record. Wiebe and others at a New Hampshire location complained to the Twin Galaxies, and eventually Mitchell's score was void for being on tape rather than being wisdomed, giving Wiebe a record again. [11] After the release of the film, Mitchell said he was not expected to be described as a bad person, and that he had received hate mail and badgering phone calls because of the way the film was edited. [11] In addition to King Kong, Mitchell appeared in several other documentaries in the 2000s and 2010s, including Chasing Ghosts: Beyond the Arcade (2007),[12] King Arcade (2014),[13] and Man vs. Snake: Long and Twin Tales of Nibbler (2014). [14] On 26 July 2007, on the 25th anniversary of Mitchell's first record-setting performance, Mitchell again retook Donkey Kong's record with a score of 1,050,200. [15] The score was known as the Mortgage Brokers score as it was made while Mitchell attended the annual convention for the Florida Association of Mortgage Brokers. [6] It was ordered on 26 February 2010, Hank Chien, who temporarily holds the record. [16] On 24 July 2010, Mitchell reclaimed the record with of the 1,062,800 in the Boomers arcade in Dania, Florida. [6] It was the last time he held the record after it was broken by Wiebe that year and others since. [18] Mitchell placed eighth out of eight in the Microsoft Xbox 360 Pac-Man World Championships on June 4, 2007. [20] In 2008, he became the first video game player on Allen's Topps trading card & Ginter. [21] In 2015, Mitchell filed a lawsuit against Cartoon Network saying that in the Regular Show a cheating character on a video game called Garrett Bobby

Ferguson (GBF) violated his likeness. [22] [23] The United States District Court for The New Jersey District of Judge Anne Elise Thompson threw out the lawsuit, saying that the television character did not match the plaintiffs in appearance. [25] [26] Billy Mitchell and Pac-Man gave a thumbs up at the 2017 Twin Galaxies/Walter Day 2014 trading card event at the Icon art gallery in Fairfield, Iowa Disputed the record in August 2017, Jeremy Young, moderator of the Donkey Kong Forum, giving birth to video-related concerns posted online Mitchell had played both Donkey Kong and Donkey Kong, Jr. that day, breaking the record for both, but used the same cabinet for him, with Kids having swapped circuit boards between runs. The videos do not show a complete record-breaking run, and Young believes there may be issues with the board exchange. Mitchell and Children insist that some parts of the board conversion were staged, but the part of the recording was well made after records were set on legitimate hardware. [6] Young continued to investigate videos of Boomers as well as scores of King Kong and Mortgage Brokers, and in early 2018 posted evidence that both scores were made on MAME, arcade-emulate hardware, rather than actual hardware. [6] Young later removed three marks from the Donkey Kong Forum website for unrefusing MAME emulation as a native game. [8] Young's claims were supported by Wes Copeland, former high score holder Donkey Kong. Based on the analysis of scoring rates and the frequency of games, he concluded that Mitchell's run showed an unlikely statistically scoring rate. [8] Further, it was determined that boomers scores and Mortgage Brokers were witnessed by Twin Galaxies referee Todd Rogers, who has been accused of submitting fraud scores for himself, putting Mitchell's score in doubt. [6] Mitchell defended his score at the East Side Dave Show shortly after this charge, saying I had never played MAME. I don't have MAME loaded in my house. [27] Mitchell added, Recording the film he had, that Jeremy had, shown the mame playing. ... I don't dispute what he said. What I dispute is that I wanted him to have the original tape. [27] Mitchell also suggested that Young's tape recordings may have been made. [28] Young replied, Total knowledge of masses, patience, and technicality would be surprising to make such a tape. [27] In support of his case, Mitchell said he sent footage of the Game Twin Galaxies from this high-score effort along with other secondary evidence to deny any fraud. [6] On April 12, 2018, the Twin Galaxies announced that an investigation conducted on the score submitted by Mitchell found conclusive evidence that Mitchell used an emulator for recording two high marks. The Twin Galaxies removed all Mitchell scores from their records and forbidding it from submitting scores in the future. [29] Afterwards, Guinness World Records issued a statement that it would remove Mitchell's score: The Guinness World Records title associated with Mr. Mitchell's highest score at Donkey Kong had all been disqualified as the Galaxies Twin became our source of confirmation for this achievement. The relegation also includes a Pac-Man Mitchell high score and the first perfect game recorded: The Twin Galaxies are the original source of confirmation for the title of this record and in line with their decision to remove all Mr. Mitchell's records from their systems, we have disqualified Mr. Mitchell as the holder of these two records. [31] Mitchell has challenged this removal with his own evidence of the high score's validity. [32] At the encouragement of his son, Mitchell had used Twitch to broadcast a score that defeated his past efforts. [6] Mitchell recreated the perfect Pac-Man score at Funsport in Laconia in July 2019, and took first place at the Donkey Kong tournament in Australia the following month. [6] The situation between Mitchell and the Twin Galaxies has raised tensions between Mitchell and some of his friends and acquaintances in the video game community. [6] Following a request to both the Twin Galaxy and Guinness to restore his record and withdraw defamation statements about it,[32] Mitchell filed a lawsuit against the Twin Galaxies in Los Angeles County in April 2019 for defamation, and filed another defamation lawsuit in Broward County, Florida against the Galaxies [33] The first hearing for the Los Angeles County lawsuit against the Twin Galaxies was held on 15 October 2020: The Twin Galaxies have tried to seek the dismissal of the case under California's anti-SLAPP lawsuit, but the judge ruled that Mitchell's claim met the minimum merits to proceed with the trial, despite ordering Mitchell to cover the legal costs of the Twin Galaxies as bail bonds should they prevail in the case. [34] [35] The Twin Galaxies filed countercriminal claims against Mitchell and Walter Day in November 2020; The lawsuit insists that Mitchell does not have the skills necessary to achieve the score, and he and Day conspired to present Mitchell as The biggest video game of all time intentionally using the modified game for Mitchell reached high marks. The Twin Galaxies' complaint also asserts that both use their influence on older Twin Galaxies properties for financial gains that have harmed current owners Twin Galaxies. [36] Guinness World Records announced in June 2020 that after a thorough review of past video evidence and other material submitted that it could not find conclusive evidence that Mitchell had used any improper methods to achieve high scores, and restored both Donkey Kong and Pac-Man Mitchell records. Mitchell had told Ars Technica that Guinness had made the decision back in December 2019, but due to an agreement related to previous legal action he had against Guinness before that, they could not announce it until June 2020. [37] Mitchell's personal life has three children and lives with his wife in Weston, Florida. [38] Mitchell's notable score set a record high score on several games in the 1980s and 1990s. Since his initial high score at Donkey Kong in 1982 and returned to record breaking attempts between 2004 and 2010, others have matched or surpassed Mitchell's score. None of these records are considered valid by the Twin Galaxies or the Guinness Book of Records. Mitchell and Chris Ayra reached the split screen level of 256 pac-Man in mid-1983. [1] In 1999, Mitchell claimed to be the first player to achieve a perfect score of 3,333,360 points. [39] He set the highest overall score at Donkey Kong with 886,900 points in 1982. [1] He set a new record score for Ms. Pac-Man of 703,560 in January 1985, which stood until it surpassed 2001 by Ayra. [40] He set a record score for Donkey Kong Jr. by 957,300 in 2004. [41] He set a record score for BurgerTime of 7,881,050 in 1984, which stood until 2005. [42] On 8 July 1985, he became the fifth person to reach the score on Centipede more than 10 million points in the marathon game. [41] He claimed to have recaptured the world record for Donkey Kong (1,062,800 points) and Donkey Kong Jr. (1,270,900) on the weekend of July 24, 2010. [43] In 2015, both records passed. [41] Donkey Kong's record was released by the Donkey Kong Forum in February 2018, which prompted the Twin Galaxies to remove the record in April 2018 after an investigation stated Mitchell did not use the original version of the Donkey Kong arcade hardware but an emulator or other unauthorized means. [30] Evidence was presented that the score had been ratified. [44] However, Guinness World Records reversed their results and reinforced Billy Mitchell's previous world record, based on new expert testimonials. [3] Honours On 14 January 1984, Mitchell was selected as one of the 1983 Video Game Players by the Twin Galaxies and the U.S. National Video Game Team [45] On June 21, 2006, MTV chose Mitchell as one of the 10 Most Influential Video Players The time.
